Grounding Practice

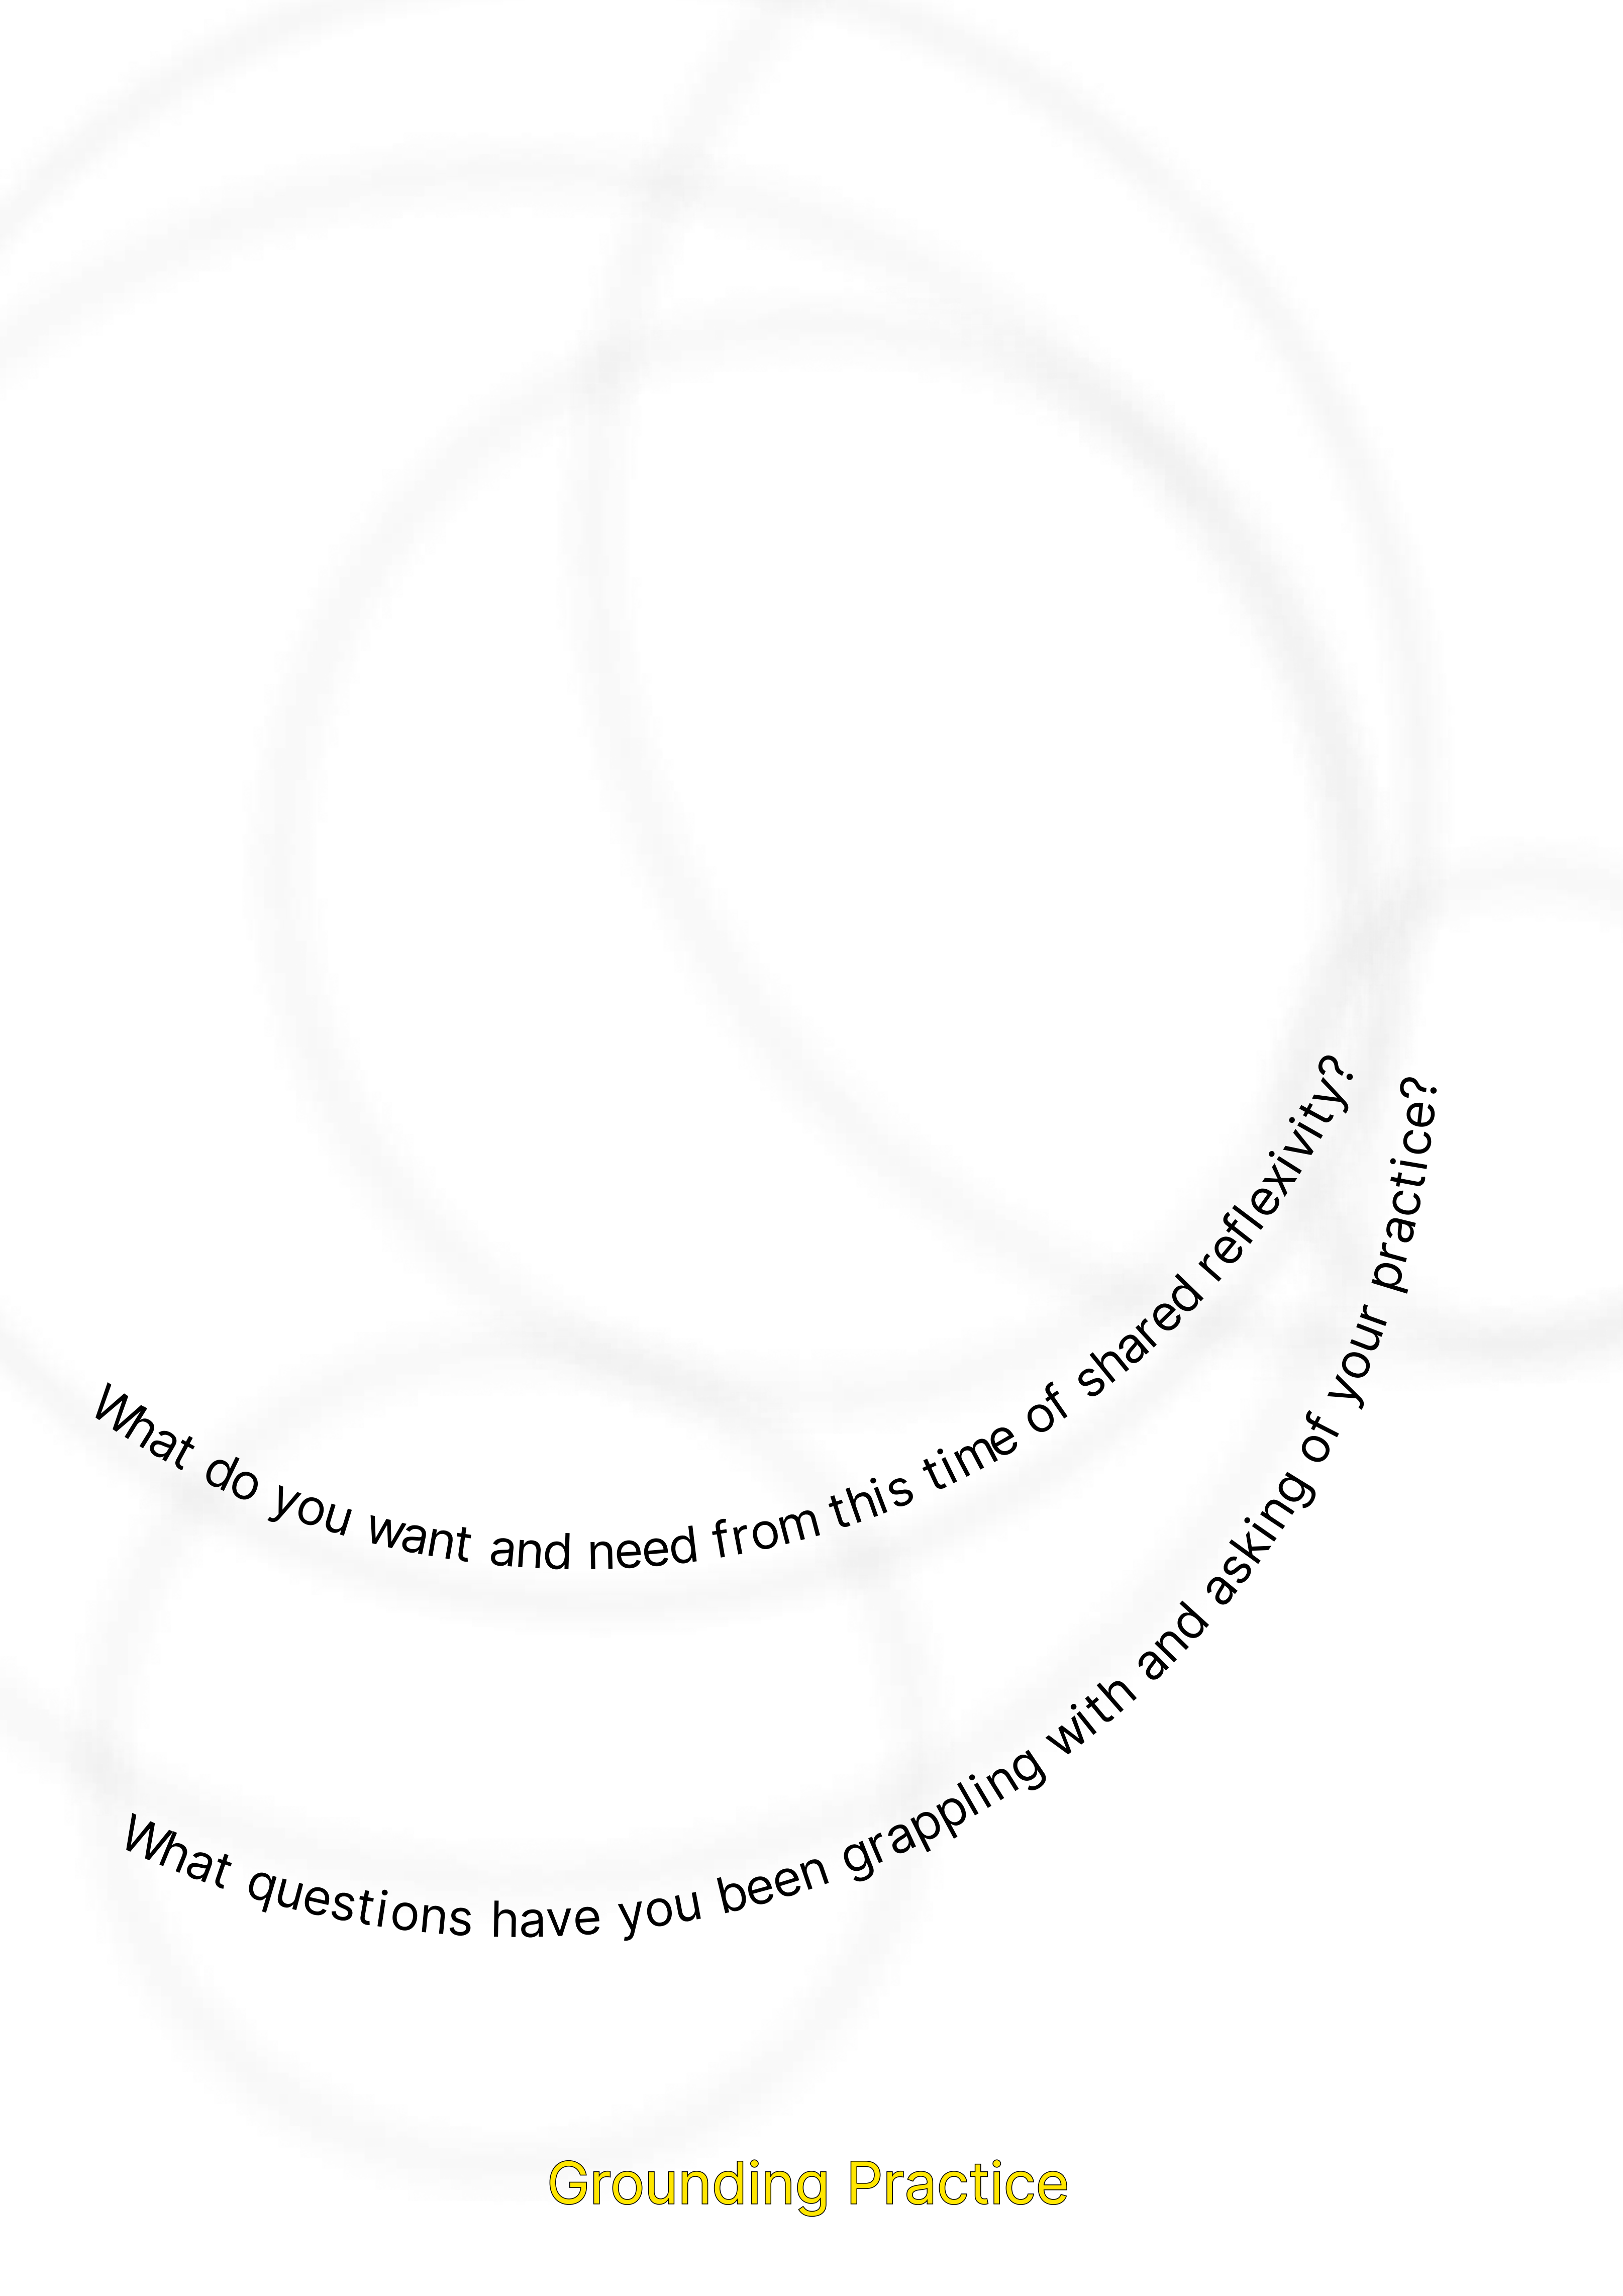

[questions to think with the
here and now of practice]

Where are you practising from? Whose pasts and presents occupy the places from which you practise?

Why are you here? What brings you to this space?

Grounding Practice

What do you want and need from this time of shared reflexivity?

What questions have you been grappling with and asking of your practice?

Grounding Practice

Your community? What are your roles and responsibilities within this community? How are you connected to your community? Whose voices are becoming louder and more urgent? What motivations currently inform your practice?

Grounding Practice

Doing Practice

[questions to think with
the methods of practice]

What does your practice look like?

What forms of relation are involved?

What is the rhythm of your practice?

Doing Practice

How do your methods help you to get to know the places and communities you are working with?

Where did you learn your practice? Where else might you find your practice?

Doing Practice

How do your methods enable communities to explore and respond to complex crises?

What methods help you to understand the situated nuances of such crises?

Doing Practice

As a means for bringing people together, how does your practice navigate and negotiate different world views?

Doing Practice

Troubling Practice

[questions to think with the complexities of caring with,
for, and about practice]

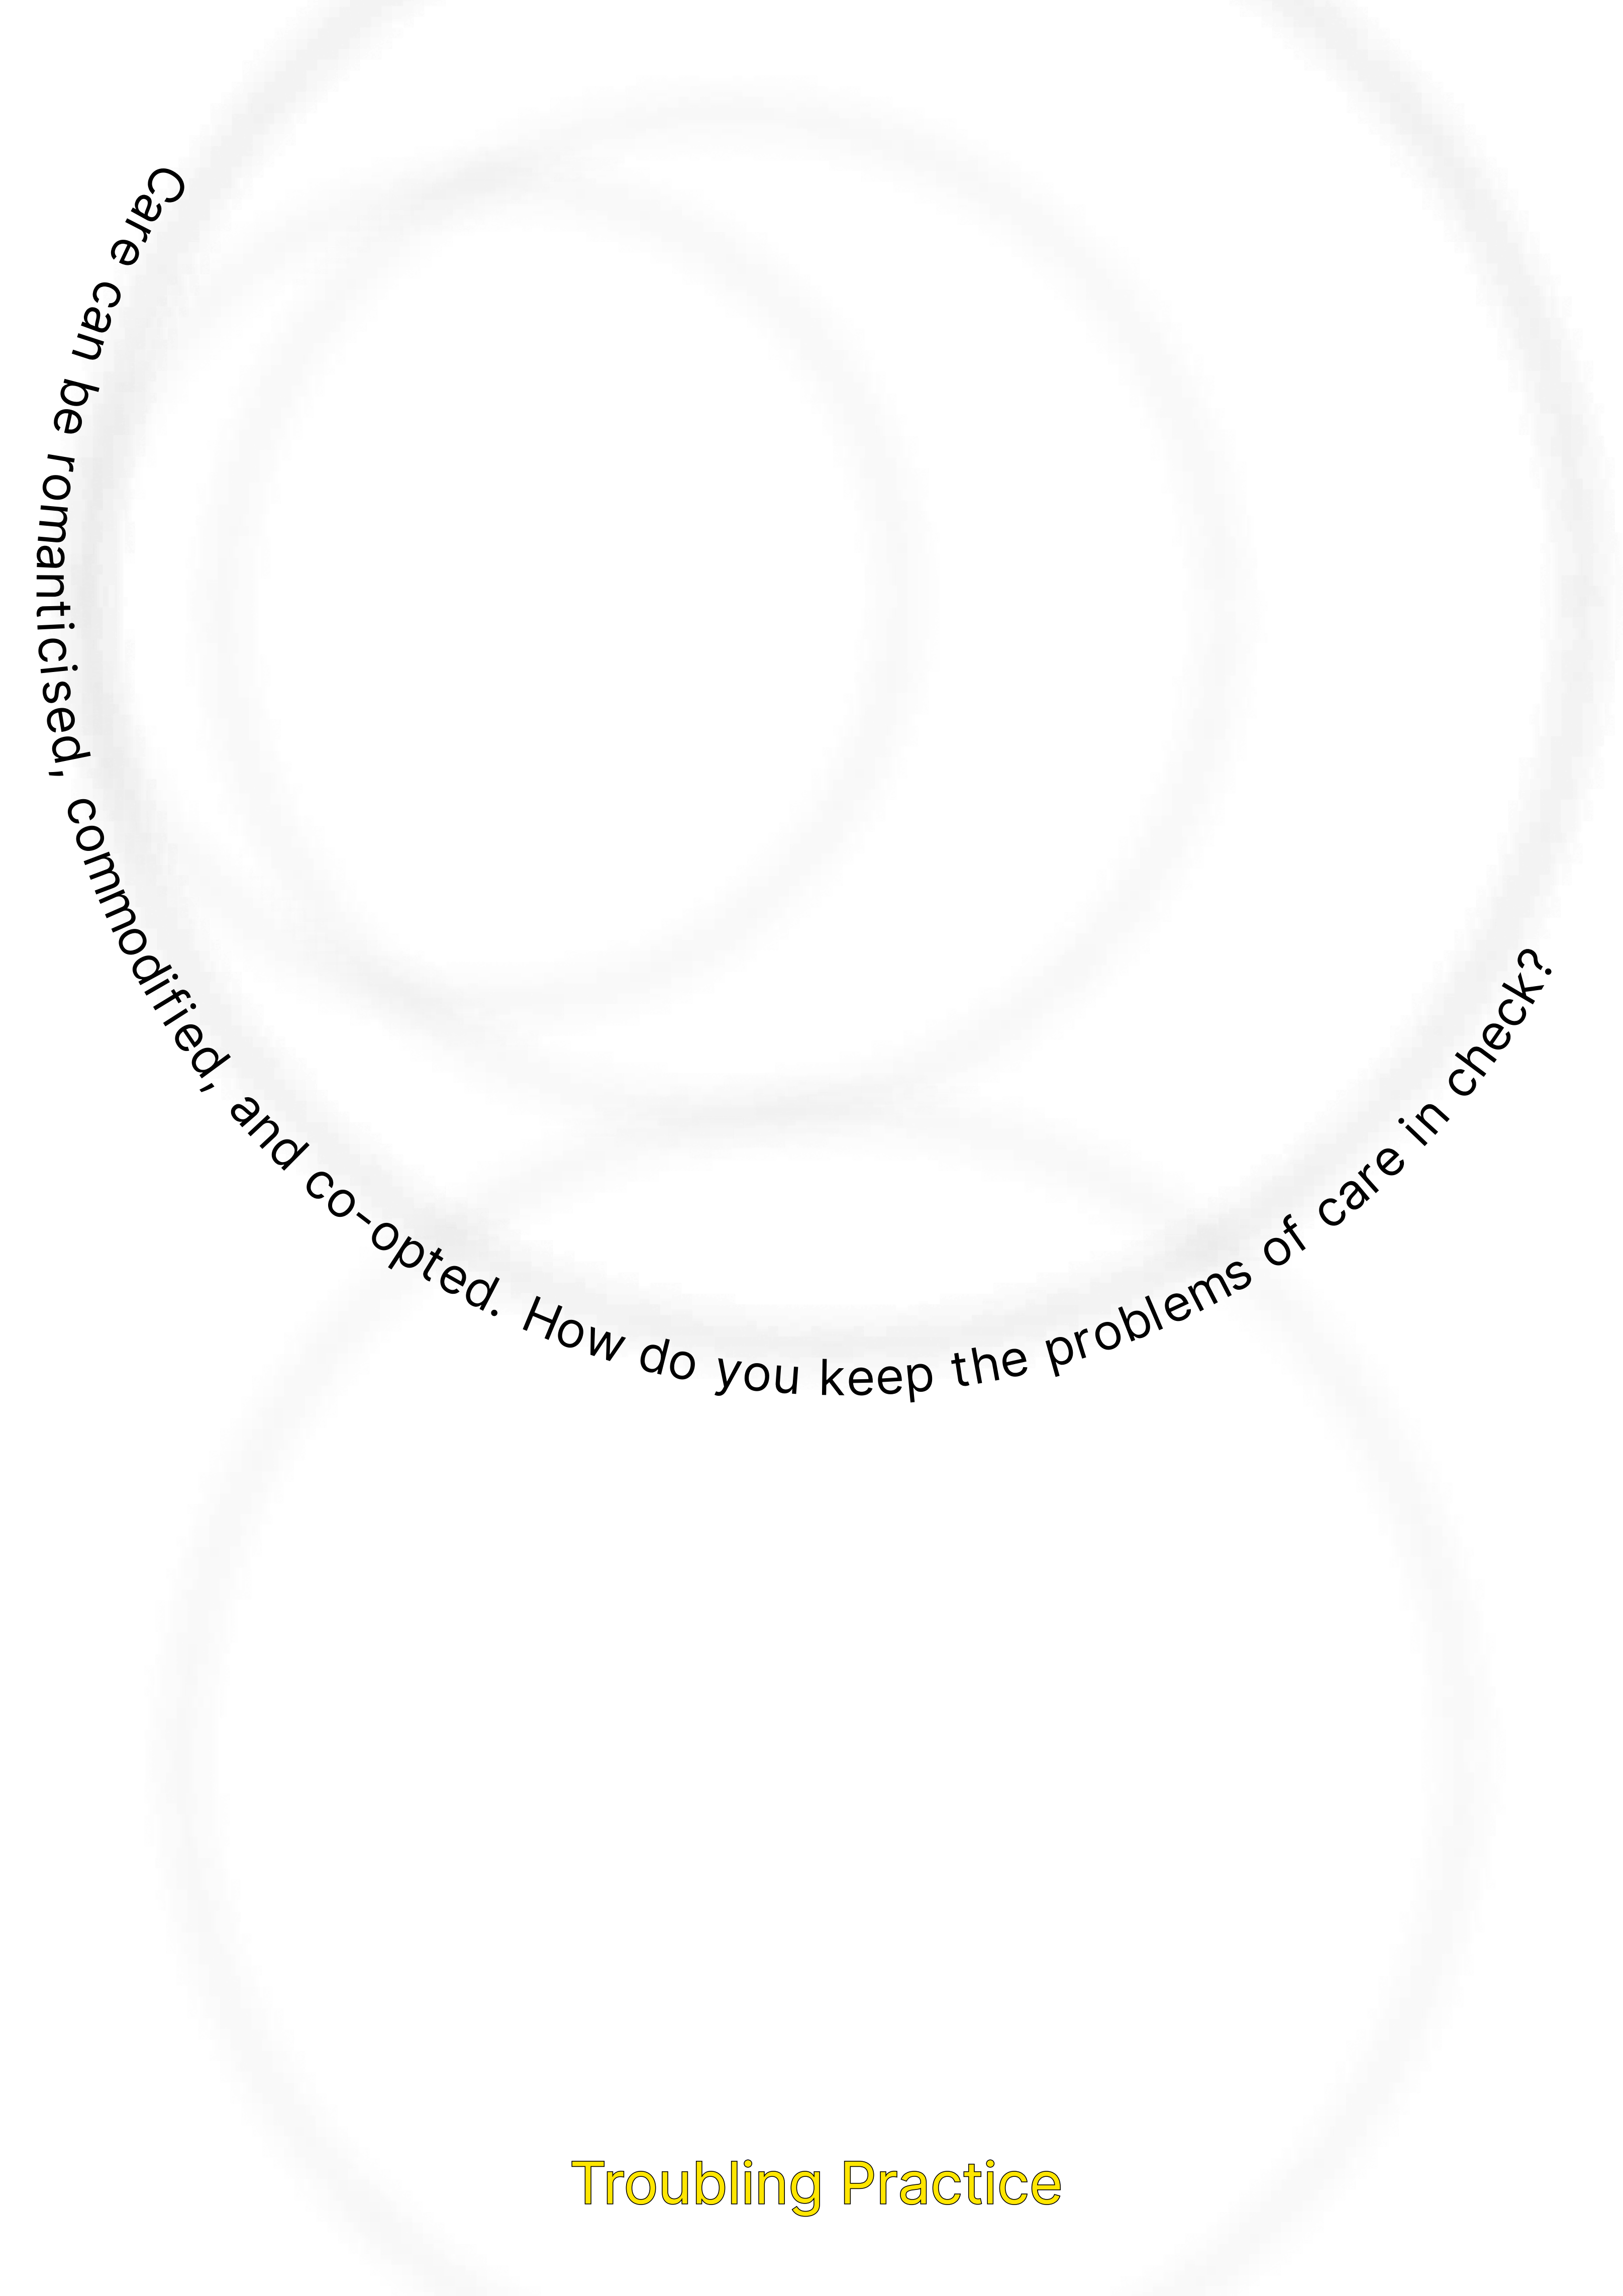

How do you choose what and who to care for? In your practice, what motivates

What does care feel like in your practice?

How are you practising care at this moment, and for whom?

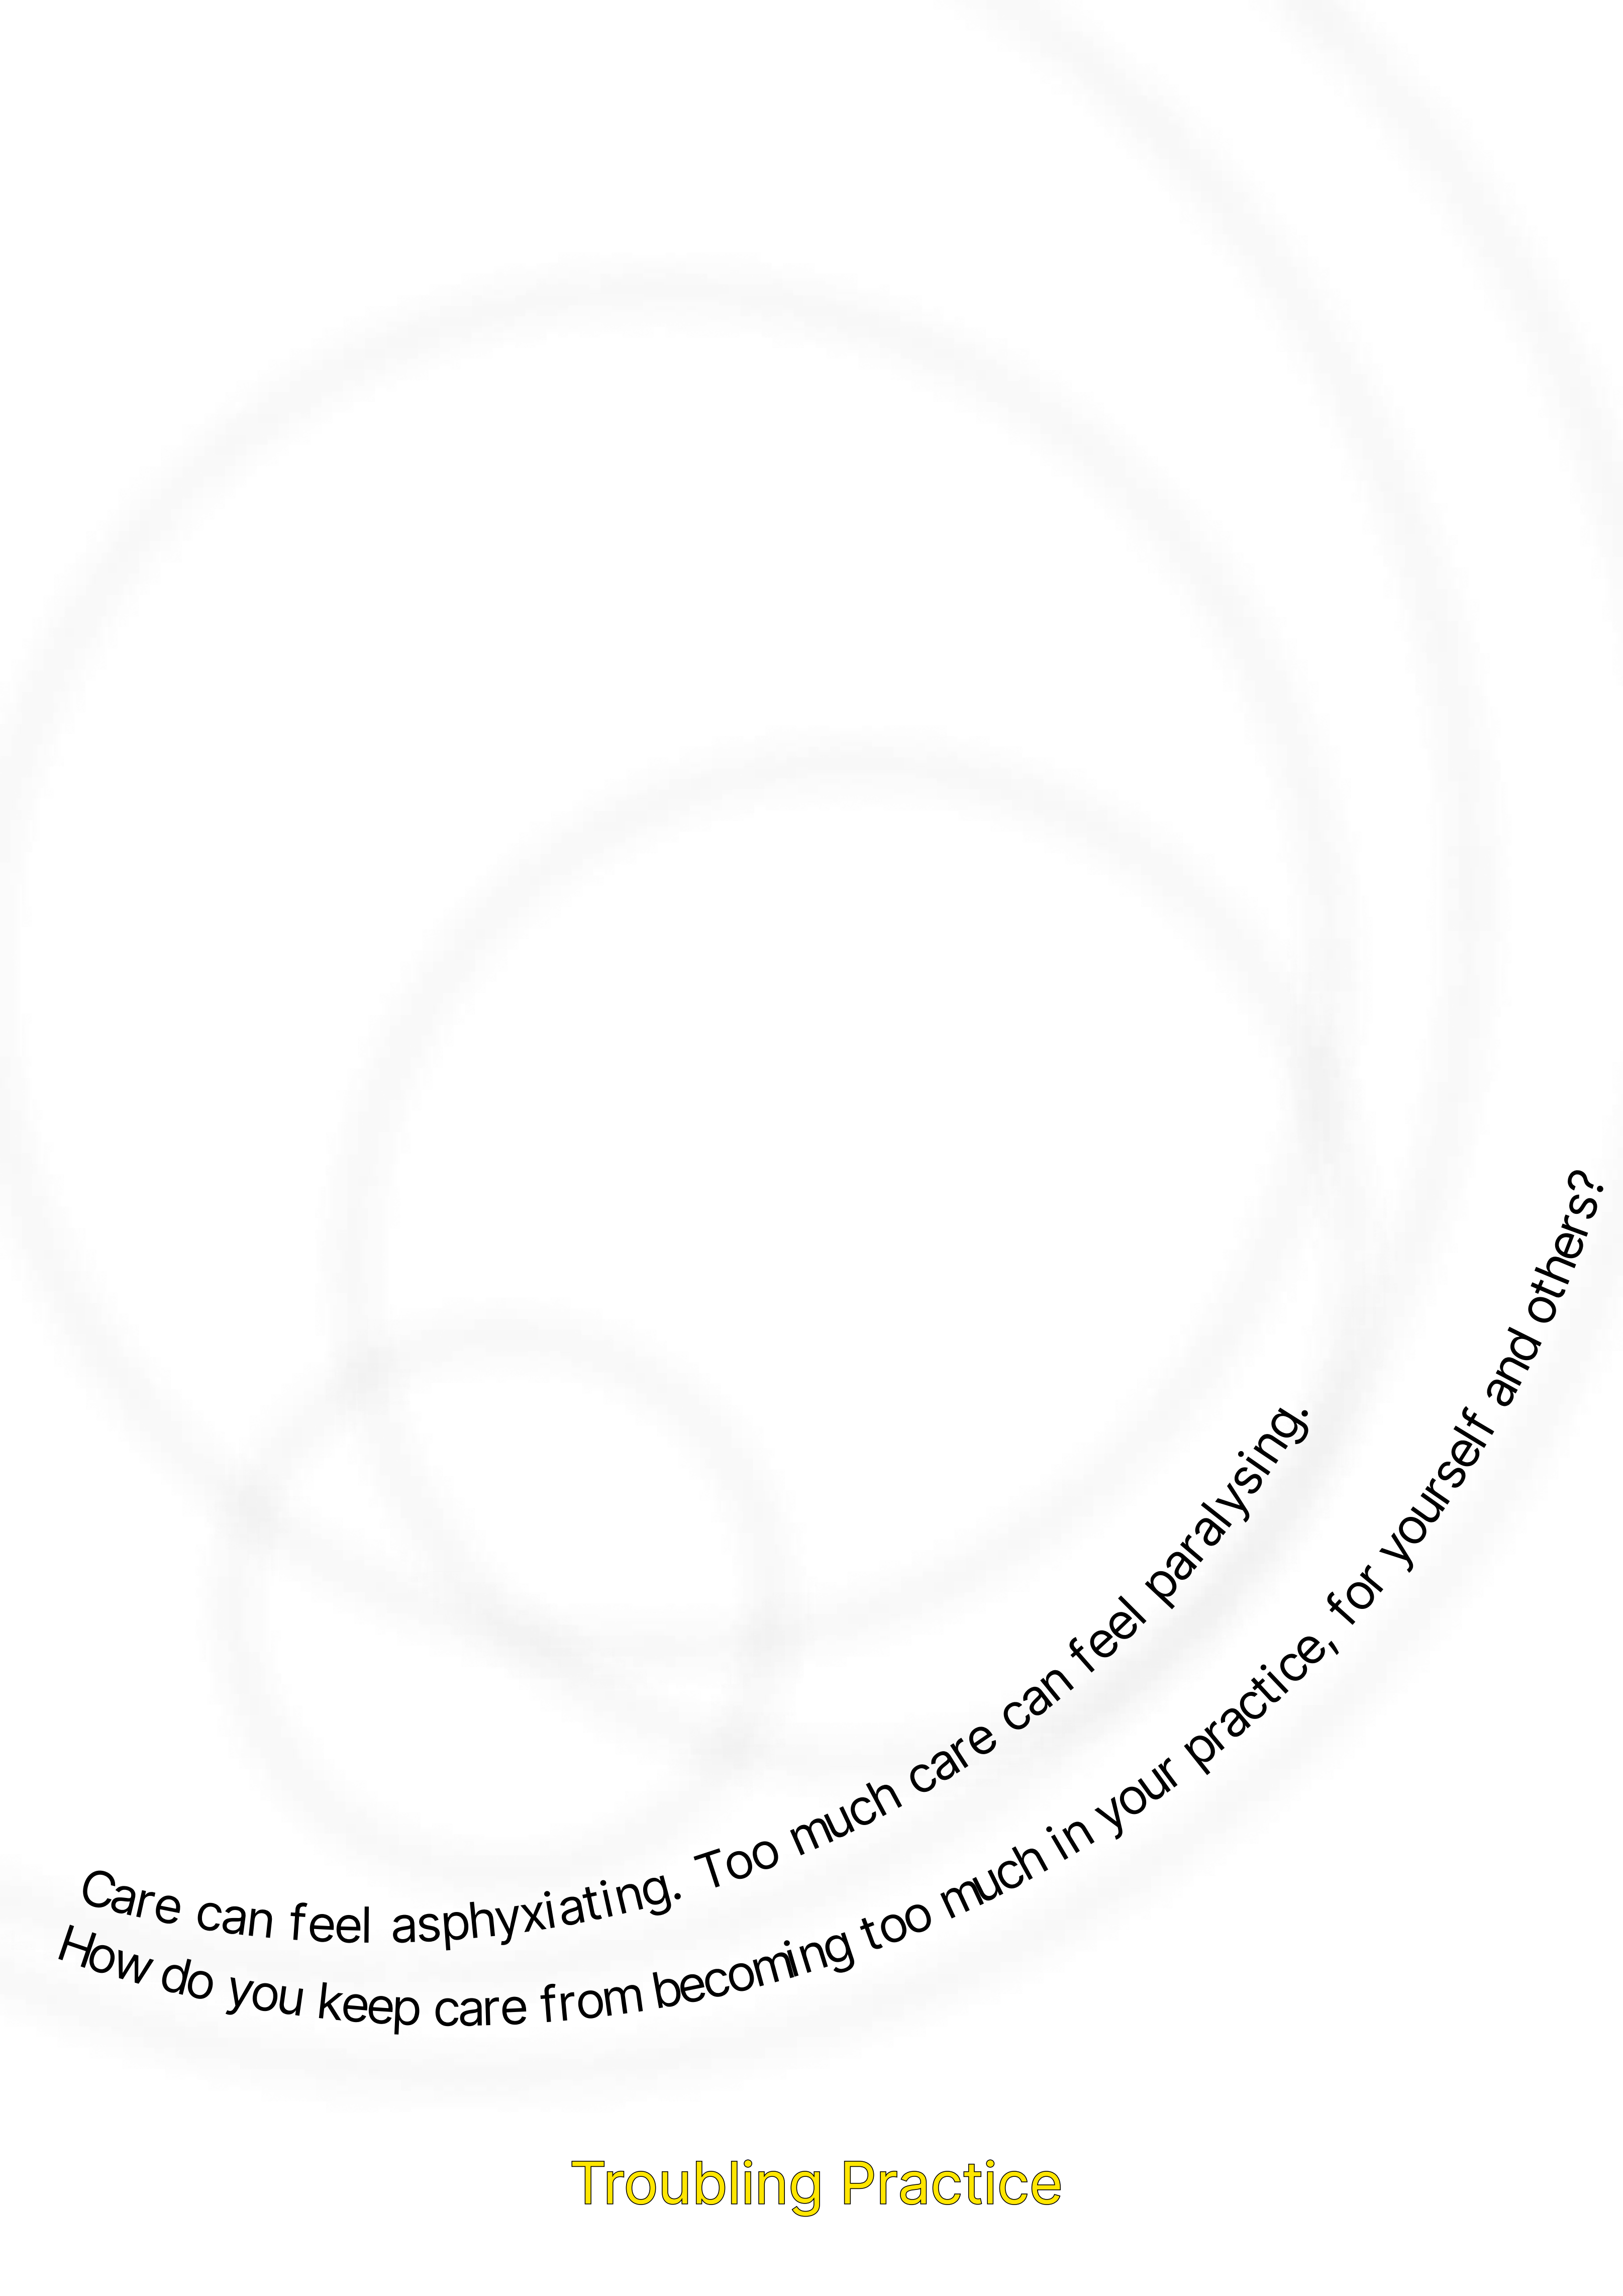

the decisions that you make to care for one thing over another?

Troubling Practice

Care can be romanticised, commodified, and co-opted. How do you keep the problems of care in check?

Troubling Practice

Care can feel asphyxiating. Too much care can feel paralyzing.
How do you keep care from becoming too much in your practice, for yourself and others?

Troubling Practice

Who cares for your needs?

What kinds of care do you need and want to cultivate, in and through your practice?

Troubling Practice

Extending Practice

[questions to think with
the futures of practice]

What elements of your practice still need to be transformed?

What questions are you continuing to grapple with about your practice?

Troubling Practice

What do you want from your practice? What do you need from your practice?

What do your needs and wants ask of the future of your practice?

What do you need to arrive?

Troubling Practice

What are you willing to accept and not accept along the way?

What can be done differently now and under these conditions?
